A shock new poll commissioned by BBC Scotlandshire has plunged the SNP and the Yes campaign into disarray, as it discovers support for separation has plunged to a disappointing 0 (zero) percent.

The poll which was conducted by dull and droning polling expert, Prof John Poltice was carried out around Glasgow, Edinburgh, Inverness and Aberdeen between the months of July and November in a particular year, and found that not a single person interviewed wanted Scotlandshire to separate from the UK.

A Better Together spokesnegator said, "Alex Salmond must now back away from this daft referendum which is creating huge uncertainty. It is clear no one, absolutely no one, in Scotlandshire - bar himself - supports this idiotic notion of separation from the rest of the UK, and to drag us all through two years of this nonsense is nothing but personal vanity."

The poll comes as a bitter blow to Separatist campaigners as they struggle to regain any kind of credibility following a calamitous few months of uncertainty. They stumbled over EU membership, tripped over currency, paid the cost of their 'pound for independence', and can't even describe what independence means.

It also comes soon after Prime Minister David Cameron seized the initiative in the debate by offering an in/out referendum on the EU, proudly offering Britons a democratic choice on continuing EU membership in seven years time.

Oor Willie Rennie, leader of the late Liberal Democrats enthused:

"This is fantastic news. It really shows the Scottish people are rejecting the lies and rejecting separation. To go to a percentage of zero, down from the previous low of 23% means there's been a whopping slump of 23%! (er, ed, could a statistician check that out?).

Scottish Tory leader Ruth Davidson was unable to comment as her head was spinning too fast to engage with the microphone.
