Yet another massive blow hit the separatists as criticism mounts over the plague of rodents infesting the Scottish Parliament. ¹ A growing problem since the Parliament building was opened; the pests have become a prolific menace under the current SNP administration of the pretendy wee Parliament.¹

The mice of Holyrood have formally complained to the Presiding Officer about their home being overrun by disease ridden rodents at the same time as the First Minister has come under fresh pressure to explain his personal policy on nocturnal activities in a separate Scotlandshire.

A spokemouse, who's heart was humming at 500 beats per minute while recollecting a recent scary encounter, told BBC Scotlandshire: "Here was me going about my business when one of them swopped down from above, a wee, sleekit, cowrin, tim'rous beastie. I was so surprised and O, what a panic's in thy breastie that a little pee came out!"

In a warning to all users of the Parliament building, the spokesmouse advised: "In a building like that, with so many nooks and crannies, there will always be beasties trying to get in."

"You hear about these vile creatures roaming about other places in Scotlandshire, particularly in the Lothians, but you don't expect to be confronted by one yourself."

"But there seems to be a lot more than there should be now because of the season and unusual voting demographics."

Concluding, the spokemouse provided a public health warning: "You really shouldn't confront these creatures as some carry nasty diseases such as Separatist Nutter Pandemic."

One building user said: "It's not a good impression for Scotlandshire's parliament to have such big rodents crawling around but there's no accounting for the democratic will of the people."
