A despicable plan hatched by hundreds of shower-averse cybernats to harass, bully and spy on brave Better Together footsoldiers has been foiled by the quick thinking genius of UKOK head, Blare MacDougall.

The scheme, which had been organised by Bathist cult leader and self-confessed blogger the Reverend Stew Camp-Bell, involved sending out clouds of cybergnats to spy on innocent loyalists as they took part in Friday's 'Great UKOK Railway Journey' – an absolutely genuine grass-roots outpouring of better togetherness.

The cybernuts had planned to photograph, question and generally upset the plucky volunteers as they enjoyed the 'Best of both Worlds', by handing out great piles of leaflets to commuters at a time when they are far too busy to stop and question any of the remarkable claims made in the pamphlets.

However, a researcher for the Daily Mail, who raking in bins with a view to exposing the reverend's camp followers to public disgrace, stumbled across the preparations which had been foolishly conducted on the Reverend's own blog, in full view of the Better Together campaign.

This allowed Blare MacDougall to thwart the separatist's plan by ordering our troops to stay away from the advertised events, leaving no-one there to be photographed or hounded by the Nats, and denying them a copy of the leaflets which they so desperately sought to analyse and decry.
