Senior figures in the Better Together campaign for British unity were today forced to deny allegations that there are splits within the campaign.

However there is growing anger and frustration following the insane intervention of a truly idiotic cabinet member who last week told the truth on currency, blowing a carefully honed strategy of bluffing but also double bluffing that it's really Dictator Eck who's bluffing.

"It is a real concern", Secretary of State for Portsmouth and against Scotlandshire Alistair Carmichaelmoore said, "that this boneheaded Tory dolt may have injected some certainty into a campaign which relies on seeding uncertainty. He should be found immediately, taken away in a tumbrel and guillotined to death. Along with that other blithering moron who blew the bluff on shipbuilding."

The row comes amid growing concern among many in the campaign to retain our fine union at the pace and momentum the NATZ appear to be setting.

"The key word is appear," a well placed UKOK source told BBC Scotlandshire.

"There may well be 'the appearance' of thousands of people on the streets, meetings up and down the country every evening and people shifting to Yes, but it is just that - an appearance. In reality it's all just Cybenats. All of it. All of them are the same handful of Cybernats with different hats and jackets to give the illusion of a thriving campaign. Our problem is that they are well funded. Enormously well funded. Despite being just a tiny band of unemployed obsessives raging at flickering, spittle-flecked computer screens, they are able to outspend the entire UK media and political establishment. And also there are damned Cybernats everywhere now! In the media, on TV, and now it seems there's even one or two in the bloody UK cabinet! Wait! What about BBC Scotlandshire? Are you harbouring Cybernats too?"

We reassured him that of course there are not. And if we found any they'd experience the full range of BBC Scotlandshire torture: the DG would personally administer watersport boarding; our Heid of News and Bias would warm up the anal probe, for his own personal use, before resorting to sleep deprivation techniques such as forcing detainees to watch endless re-runs of Andy Stewart Specials; and finally find themselves against the wall being shot and not with a camera!

But by that time our source was busy searching under the sofa and behind curtains mumbling about splittists within being the worst type of splittists.

One leading Labour figure placed the blame firmly with the Tories, saying, "We believed they would put the union before everything else, as we do. However it now seems some are less committed to the union and more to doing anything they can to damage and diminish Labour. No one could ever have predicted that happening when Labour entered the Better Together coalition with them. If we lose the UK (along with all our expenses and speaking fees) it will all be the Tories fault."

However a Senior Tory retorted, "That's utter nonsense. It was failed Chancellor Alistair Darling who insisted to us that the Scotch would fall into line cowering if we vetoed a currency union outright, despite it being something that would clearly be on the table after a yes vote...I mean off the table. I mean...Well anyway....But then it was Labour who also assured us Scotlandshire only voted SNP as a blip in 2007 and they'd be back with a landslide as Scotlandshire's natural party in 2011. And of course assured us the Scottish parliament, which we sensibly opposed, would kill nationalism stone dead. So whoever listened to them on this is a madman. If we lose the UK (along with nuclear weapons, hard power and all the lucrative back-handers from health corporations) it will be all Labour's fault."
