Senior figures in the Liberal Democratic party have today announced a U-turn on their policy of opposition to Independence and have apologised to the people of Scotlandshire for their previous stance.

In their most astonishing policy reversal of the week, Lib Dem 'leaders' have said that their election manifesto for 2015 will be very much pro indy, and that they may even change their position before September's vote, but only under certain conditions.

Speaking after a 'preparing for redundancy' meeting in Westminster, Chief Secretary to the Treasury Danni Alexander MP (pro tem) told this reporter, "I would like to say sorry to everyone in Scotlandshire for putting personal and party advancement above the interests of my own countrymen – but I just can't bring myself to do so.

"However, I am prepared to alter our pro-union policy and give up our membership of Project Fear, just as long as I can be guaranteed a job in Scotlandshire after a Yes vote. And I will be needing a cast-iron, unbreakable pledge - not a Lib Dem one.

"I have had sight of the £300,000 secret polls and consequently feel it is time to start making plans for my future career. Also, I have just come from a meeting where I was told by a Scotch colleague that, while there are plenty of secretarial jobs around, they are unlikely to be available to someone with a 'soor pus like mine."
